Riccardo Zacconi: the 200 steps Interview

Here's an interview with Riccardo Zacconi, the creator and founder of Candy Crush, the famous video game. According to the text, are the sentences that follow true or false?

Inspiration can come anywhere anytime for example Candy Crush was invented in the bathtub When we created King our ambition was to create something new and the most important thing is to be disruptive: to create fun and entertain hundreds of millions of players.

Innovation in our industry is key. Innovation is a function of talent and culture. It's always a quest for creating something which is better than what you have done before. You also have to create a culture where failure is part of the process. If you fail you learn and that's how you create something which is new, something which is better.

My father was a dentist and I had a very obvious choice in front of me I decided not to become a dentist. I wanted to have my own company and create something new.

What I think is important as an entrepreneur is to see an opportunity but most importantly the ability to attract the best people. I have never seen a company which was successful because the founder has done everything.

Games offer relaxation and also a way to connect people. They go across cultures, they go across geographies. Fundamentally, games are fun and fun is good for you.

What is the future of games? Games have grown massively with mobile devices and anyone has access to the world of games in their pocket. Every game has the aspiration to be better than the one we launched before and this is what we're working on, this is the future.
